Shelter in place illinois october 2020

If you've been working from home and strictly adhere to quarantine guidelines, it may have been weeks since you've driven the car. No one really knows how long it's going to take us to get back to normal – or what that's going to look like. But one thing we do know is that your car still needs attention as long as it's in place. So even if they might not lead and get out of work or take their kids to their activities, that doesn't mean they should neglect one of their biggest investments. We'll tell you what you need to do to keep the car in top shape. First of all, you have to get out and drive. Consumer Reports recommends driving your car at least once a week for at least 20 minutes. This helps keep the battery in good condition, prevents rust from building up on the brakes and calipers by grabbing it up and getting gas, oil and other fluids flowing. Speaking of gas, you can go bad if it is too long – usually about 30 days or more. At this point, rubber gum deposits can develop, and ethanol in the mixture begins to draw water from the atmosphere into the tank. Fuel stabilizers can prevent this, but they're designed to pour into the tank before the car won't be driven for a long time. So assuming you didn't give me a fuel stabilizer for your gas months ago, you're going to have to drive your car to burn the gas. Then fill the tank with fresh fuel – it's a record low price, so it's a plus. And then don't forget to wash your hands. While the car is parked and cold, check the oil to see if it's low or dirty. The user manual will help you find the dipstick and identify the markings to determine the appropriate oil level. It's ok to postpone the oil change slightly, but it still might be safe, as it's considered an essential service in most states. Some stores also allow you to continue in the car during the oil change; call in advance to find this shop offering it. You should also check your tires regularly anyway, and even more so if you don't drive the car much (if at all). This is because the tires may lose pressure or end up with flat spots sitting for too long. If the tires need to be replaced, look for a shop that maintains social delimited procedures, or better yet, a tire installer that comes to you. If you don't run into major engine problems, mechanics are also considered essential services in most states, so you can have your car repaired. Just be sure to take the car's interior once you pick it up. Consumer Reports has published guidelines on how to do this for the safety of the car. And according to Consumer Reports, AAA still provides roadside assistance in case of emergency and implement social delimitation protocols for such incidents. If something goes wrong, make sure to let your car supply slip in the wake of all this confusion; it's probably fine – it takes more than a few or even a few months of occasional neglect can seriously damage otherwise well-maintained maintenance. However, a little attention now will go a long way to regaining mobility once quarantine ends. When L.M.
